NATIONALLY RECOGNISED
TRAINING

What training does a food safety supervisor need?

A food safety supervisor must have a statement of attainment issued by a Registered Training Organisation (RTO) for the competencies identified in Table 1, or have demonstrated to an RTO that they have the prior skills, experience or training to meet these competencies

Do I need this course?

Under the food safety Act 2006, every licensable food business in Queensland is required to have a food safety supervisor. New food businesses are required to notify their local government within 30 days of the issue of their license. There are penalties for not having a Food Safety Supervisor in your workplace.

Who can become a food safety supervisor?

Anyone, including the business owner, licence holder, employee or an external contractor, can be a food safety supervisor for a business provided they meet the required competencies and are reasonably available at all times the business is operating.

A food safety supervisor is required to take a lead role in supervising food safety in your food business. Apart from holding the required competencies, they must:

- Have the ability to supervise food handling practices in the food business
- Be reasonable available at all times the business is operating.
- Have the authority to supervise and give instructions to food handlers.
